Smashing an Idel. Under the title of "A College Fetich"

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jr. has just delivered before the Phi Betta Kappa Society, at Harvard, an address which, first of all, is remarkable for its audacity. Mr, Adams is not only a college-bred man but a Harvard-bred man; yet he pulls down and smashes a college idol and a Harvard idol, jumps on it and kicks about its broken pieces as though he was dealing with a Hindoo god or one of those hideous wooden ogres of the Indians of the North

Mr. Adams has the boldness to charge that his alma mater wronged him by forc-

"Who is the in that dead tongue remain hidden and forever dead. There is no scarcity of college graduates in Wheeling; it may be doubted whether any one of them five years from college would like to stand up on sight for a freshman's examination in Greek. There is no mental training to be not be had without it, with the additional not be had without it, with the additional advantage that a study can be put in its place which will be serviceable not only as mental discipline but as well for its own practical value.

And this brings us to a strong point in Mr. Adams' address. There is no pursuit, except the teaching of Greek, in which a knowledge of this dead and difficult language is indespensable. Greek lacks the relation to the English and certain of the modern European languages which Latin "Are reporters ever sarcastic?" modern European languages which Latin bears. It cannot be claimed for Greek, as for Latin, that it is the language of technical expression. It can not be said for Greek, as for German and French, even Spanish and Italian, that it is a language of the highest cotemporary thought. most that can be said for Greek is that some superficial knowledge of it is necessary to get into and out of college. After that it is quite permissible to forget it. The world does not make the same demands

Mr. Adams' leading idea is that the college ought to place itself in line with the young men for their life work in a severely practical age. He would not banish Greek from the class room, but he would so modify the requirements that a candidate for admission might be examined in such other language than English or Latin as as he might choose—Hebrew, progress of the time, to do what it can to fit Latin as as he might choose—Hebrew, Charles Gouod, the illustrious composer, lives in Paris in a superb massion of unique design. It has the severely solemn aspect of a monastery, and there are starn-looking locks, grim iron gratings, gloomy passages, and a huge, myaterious staircase. But the looks and gratings are adorned with graceful female heads, the passages lighted np with beautiful pictures and statnary, and the stairs richly carpeted, lead up to the master's room, a huge, light, airy apartment, containing massive furniture, a big organ, and a desk-piano at which he can sit and compose music and write it down at once.

Breton Superstitions

Mr. Adams has the boldness to charge that his alma mater wronged him by forcing him to bow down before the fetich of the Greek language, hard to learn, rarely mastered, after all of little use. What she did to him she did to the other members of his class of '56. Other colleges were doing the same thing at the same time, and he has not much reason to believe that the colleges are doing better to-day. Mr. Adams admits for Greek all that is claimed for it, and after that he maintains that the game is not worth the candle. He took the regulation does of Greek—that was necessary, or he never could have gone through college; and now he is forced to confess he has forgotten the Greek alphabet, and if he opens his Homer he can not read the Greek characters—"such," he says, "has been the be-all and the end-all of the tremendous labor of my school days."

There may be men who have had a better experience with their Greek, who can read half a page of the Iliad without a grammar in one hand and a lexicon in the other, but they are likely to be the Greek and in the colleges. To all excent a grammar in one hand and a lexicon in the other, but they are likely to be the Greek and in the colleges. Such an Easy Liar.

The proprietor of a down-town restau-rant who is celebrated for his dry wit, a few days ago heard one of his patrons com-plaining rather noisily of the food that was set before him. As he passed the table at which the fault-finder sat, the urbane host turned and said: "I always respect a man who, having an opinion, is not afraid to who, having an opinion, is not afraid to proclaim it to the whole world; I have a large amount of respect for you sir."
